

March 8, 1905.

Professor S. Graham Kerr,

University of Glasgow, Glasgow, Scotland.

Dear Sir;-

Some considerable time ago you very kindly sent us a specimen of Lepidosiren, with the request that we would send you something in exchange therefor. It gives me pleasure to inform you that we have prepared for you and are sending to you a reproduction of the hind leg of Diplodocus carnegii, contained in two boxes. A base which will support the bones of the foot is also provided, and I think you will have no trouble, with the help of the photograph which we are also sending you, in placing the bones of the foot as they are intended to be placed upon the base. The iron supports for this huge limb are also sent with it. No other specimen of this kind has ever been sent to Europe as yet save the reproduction which I am about to go to England to install in the Gallery of Reptiles at the British Museum.

The gift of this specimen to your University I think may be regarded as an equivalent in value of the specimen which you have sent us, as the actual cost of making such a reproduction as that sent you represents a very considerable monetary outlay, and we would not part with a similar specimen for less than one hundred pounds sterling if disposed of in the way of sale. I hope that the sending may be received promptly. The freight is prepaid by us to destination. If anything should happen to go wrong, you might write me, and in any event I should be pleased to hear from you, and you may address me in care of Prof. E. Ray Lankester, British Museum, Natural History, Cromwell Road, London, W., England.

With assurances of esteem, I am,

Yours very truly,

Dear Sir,

In reply to your letter of February 1st, 1900, Director Carnegie Museum.

I wish to say that, although realizing the interest of the collection of antiquities, it is not possible for the Carnegie Museum to enter into negotiations at the present time for the purchase of the same. Our financial position would not permit of such an expenditure.

I herewith return to you your list

I am,

Yours sincerely,

Charles Dreyer

Assistant to the Director
